Some people say that being unemployed is better than to have a job that is not enjoyed. I believe that those decisions depend solely on the person and their specific situation.

On the one hand, no one wants to have a job that they dislike. With jobs like that, it is often difficult for a person to force themselves to go to work every day. And having a job that one does not enjoy can negatively affect a person's physical or mental health. These people may also find that this situation can also affect other areas of their lives, including relationships with families and friends.

On the other hand, a person who has a job, even if it is a less satisfying job, will still have a paycheck that should allow that person to support himself and his family. Not only that, but students have shown that it is easier for people to get hired for other jobs if they currently have a job, as compared to those being unemployed. In other words, prospective employers will often find unemployed applicants. Sometimes unemployed status can raise red flags with prospective employers, who may be wondering why an applicant is not working and whether that applicant would quit another job at the first sign of disappointment.

All in all, each individual has to determine his own fate with decisions as to whether they will be better off to quit a job they barely enjoy or whether they should stick with that job until they can find a job that is more enjoyable and more fulfilling. It is important to consider their financial situation as well as physical or mental stress which can affect one's quality life.

An increasing number of people are changing their careers. What are the reasons? Do you think it is positive or negative?

1. 人们不再认为会在同一家公司待太久
2. 对于员工的忠诚度，有些公司不是特别重视

成为有利的趋势的因素

1. 提高职业的满意度
2. 纠正以往择业的一些错误
3. 更高的生活质量，收入

Some people wonder why career changes are becoming more prevalent and whether those more frequent changes are having a positive or a negative effect. Although one can certainly argue about the positive or negative effects, I believe that these changes can be positive, if the person making the career change is doing so for the right reasons.

Admittedly, companies come and go in our fast-paced world economy, so it is probably no longer realistic for a person to think that they will be able to start and finish working with the same company. Along the same lines, it should be noted that many companies and employers do not value loyalty as much as their counterparts from previous generations.

This trend can be positive if people change jobs for the following purposes. First, they make career changes in an attempt to find more satisfaction or fulfillment with their new career. Second, they made a mistake in the previous career they chose for themselves but it is not late to pursue a more suitable one. Lastly, some people make career changes in search of a more desirable lifestyle, more career advancement, or a higher income.

If people choose a different career path so they can be happier or more fulfilled in their careers, I support them to do so. Happy and fulfilled employees are more productive and their employers will be benefited. Everyone deserves the chance to have a better career development. If career change is the key to their future success, they should not hesitate to make the change.

Nowadays, many young people tend to change their jobs very frequently. Several factors contribute to the phenomenon and I think it is a positive phenomenon as a whole.

Young people change their jobs for many reasons. Some young employees' goal is to work in different kinds of companies to accumulate experience and gain a wide relationship network. In this way, they can have the advantageous background and have better chances of getting high-paying jobs than others. Another reason is that many young generations are more curious about new careers. Unlike their previous generations who were used to sticking with one job, young people nowadays are more willing to challenge themselves and break the status quo. Apart from that, it is not uncommon that some young employees lack career plans and blindly pursue well-paid jobs that are not suitable for them.

Pursuing new jobs has many advantages. Being exposed to various working fields, young people can broaden their experience and acquire new skills. In addition, fresh working environment can boost enthusiasm for work. For companies, they will be able to have new blood with inspiration to their teams. Although employers may need to look for replacements on a regular basis, this is inevitable. Holding people at positions that they no longer have interest in is far riskier than letting them go.

The change of careers is beneficial to both employees and companies' development and companies should be more open-minded about this trend. As new staff bring new ideas and energy to the existing teams and contribute more to future development.

Some people think job satisfaction is more important than job security, while others believe that having a permanent job is better than enjoying the job. Discuss both views and give your own opinion.

Although, at least ideally, it would be preferred for a person to have a job or a career they love, it should also be pointed out that people need to make a living and provide for themselves or their families. And sometimes, those necessities encourage people to make compromises with their jobs and careers.

On the side of job satisfaction, it is always nice for a person to have a job that they enjoy. People who enjoy their jobs are generally people who are working harder and living more fulfilled lives. But it is only fair to point out that sometimes satisfying jobs are not as stable as people would prefer them to be. For example, starting a business may give the owner more freedom to work in the preferred way, but it does not necessarily mean that the business will be long-lasting. Also, sometimes those satisfying jobs do not pay enough to support people and their families.

With this in mind, job security can sometimes outweigh job satisfaction, as people make compromises in seeking out and working jobs that might be more stable or more permanent, as compared to more satisfying jobs that might not have the same stability or might not be as financially rewarding.

Ideally, we would all have jobs that are both satisfying and secure. However, as not everyone is always blessed to have both, people then have to make choices or compromises as to whether passion is more important than security. There is no right or wrong answer, but those are decisions that people need to make as individuals, based on their own wants and needs.
